The Honorable Mitch McConnell

S-230, US Capitol

Dear Speaker Pelosi and Majority Leader McConnell:

As representatives of our 17 million members and all American workers, we write to thank you for your national leadership during this ongoing crisis to protect the wages, salaries, and benefits of working people and to help families make it through these deeply challenging times. We write to ask you to extend that protection and help to the 640,000 steadfast employees of the United States Postal Service (USPS) who every day carry out their essential services on behalf of the people of this country.

Without immediate intervention, USPS may be forced to shut down this summer or fall, depriving all Americans of a trusted lifeline amid a global pandemic and cutting off a key service used by businesses, religious communities, and civic organizations. This cannot be allowed to happen. We cannot reopen our country without the Postal Service. We must stand with hundreds of thousands of frontline workers and protect their jobs, and the individuals, businesses and organizations that rely on this critical service. The mail must go through.

The work ethic and commitment of our postal workers is a part of the American identity. While millions of Americans shelter at home, USPS workers have continued their rounds at great personal risk. As of April 27, over 1,800 postal workers have either tested positive for coronavirus or are presumed infected, and more than 40 have lost their lives. Yet despite the danger, undaunted postal clerks, mail handlers, letter carriers and all those who handle our mail have served the public and delivered packages, mail, and life-saving medicine – including 4 million prescriptions per day – six days a week, without interruption, to every part of our country. They have provided us with a measure of certainty and security in a deeply uncertain time. We owe them no less.

Congress has the power to protect this essential service and 640,000 postal jobs by providing emergency relief that matches the unprecedented disruption caused by the pandemic. On April 9, Postmaster General Megan Brennan testified to the “devastating effect” of coronavirus and a “sudden” and “steep” drop in mail volume, particularly first-class mail, costing tens of billions of dollars in the coming eighteen months. At the same time, the Postal Service has stepped up to deliver public health information, relief checks and a huge surge in parcels to Americans sheltering in place, helping our country contain the virus.

Some have falsely blamed low prices on the Postal Service’s already profitable parcel business for the crisis – instead of the pandemic-induced shutdown of the economy. They propose to use this crisis to raise shipping rates on tens of millions of businesses that rely on the Postal Service, or to cut back on service quality and days of delivery. We strongly oppose actions to punish the American businesses and families that rely on postal services – which includes the tens of millions of Americans and business located in dozens of rural states.

In solidarity with USPS workers and hundreds of millions of individuals, families and businesses who rely on the Postal Service, we ask Congress to support a $25 billion emergency appropriation to offset mounting losses and help USPS weather this pandemic, a proposal also supported by the Board of Governors, as well as additional support to cover covid-related revenue shortfalls in the next fiscal year. We further ask Congress to include postal workers in any federal programs to provide sick leave and hazard pay for those risking ongoing exposure to COVID-19.

Relief at this critical moment will protect the livelihoods of our frontline workers, preserve an essential service for all U.S. households, and ensure that the Postal Service is ready to help reopen the economy by supporting millions of American businesses that rely on USPS every day, particularly in our rural communities.

At a moment when the federal government has stepped up to support struggling businesses of all shapes and sizes, and invested in critical industries, from aviation to agriculture, it is both fitting and urgently necessary to address the needs of the USPS and its workers now.

The mission of the Postal Service, written in federal law, is “to bind the Nation together” through “the correspondence of the people.” It is our collective responsibility to preserve that bond. The Postal Service is older than our nation itself and is the only federal agency enshrined in the United States Constitution. We ask for your commitment to support the Board’s request to stand by this unique and irreplaceable national service and the dedicated Americans who work every day to fulfill its mission.
